"Light In August" was challenging, but less so than some of some of his other novels with multiple narrators. The book did jump around a lot in time and place. The story was disturbing, especially in its depiction of the seldom-challenged racism and violence of the Jim Crow South (the book takes place in the 1920's, with some of the older ...

Light In August (1932) was his first attempt to address the racial issues of the South, an effort continued in Absalom, Absalom! (1936), and Go Down, Moses (1942). By 1946, most of Faulkner's novels were out of print in the United States (although they remained well-regarded in Europe), and he was seen as a minor, regional writer.
